Illinois Army National Guard official put on leave in federal probe

CHICAGO (AP) — The Illinois Army National Guard has put one of its top officials on paid leave while he is under investigation for what sources described as allegations of sexual harassment and intimidating witnesses.

Col. James M. Burgess, the guard's Springfield-based chief of staff, will continue to receive his $102,907 annual salary while he is on administrative leave, a National Guard spokesman said.

"He was placed on administrative leave because we believe it's in the best interests of both he and the agency," Maj. Mark Hurley said today by telephone from Guard headquarters at Camp Lincoln in Springfield.

Hurley claimed not to know why Burgess had been placed on leave. He referred questions about that to the Federal Bureau of Investigation

Kevin Corr, supervisory special agent for the FBI, declined to confirm or deny that any investigation involving Burgess was under way.

But sources familiar with the case, speaking on condition of anonymity, said allegations of sexual harassment and intimidation of witnesses against Burgess were under investigation by the FBI. The Chicago Tribune and The (Springfield) State Journal-Register first reported on the investigation

Yates said he's impressed with McGee's intention to get the state testing program under control, including the number of hours required for the tests. McGee also is determined to make the tests more meaningful to both students and the schools, including making the tests more useful in diagnosing student learning problems, Yates said Yates also said he's encouraged by McGee's interest in the school construction grant program and his work with the state legislature in funding it McGee is also working on new certification initiatives for administrators and teachers

Yates also credited McGee with postponing for a year the new Prairie State exam, designed to measure what students have learned in 12 years in six learning areas. Yates said there were "all kinds of complications" with the exam, which had been scheduled to come out next spring.

"One of his main concerns is having a positive relationship with the legislative leaders," Yates said McGee has met with the legislative leadership as well as Gov. George Ryan, Yates noted.

"He's an educator. He's been in the trenches," Yates said McGee was superintendent at the Deerfield elementary district and has a rich background in educational issues, Yates said. "Max is going to have a lot of support, and we know he's going to be successful" if the legislature and state board work together, Yates said

Dwight Superintendent Dale Adams said he enjoyed meeting McGee. "I was impressed with him personally," Adams said today. "He is down-to-earth, and his background as a practicing superintendent and teacher are important."

Adams said he considers McGee a person who can compromise and build relationships with both parties in the legislature, important since the state board depends on the legislature for both funding and education rules. McGee has already met with Chicago's mayor and the city's cardinal as he tries to head education in one of the country's diverse states with its own special problems, he said.

Because of McGee's recent jobs, "he's got a good priority of issues that need to be addressed by the state board," Adams said. "He's got a big task, and the neat thing is he absolutely wants to do that (task) " some of his students, almost all of them black. From the mid-1890s into the 1930s, Googerty served as a blacksmithing instructor at the reformatory, and turned it into an art school, Miller said.

Googerty

Miller said his own theory is that Googerty reached a tacit understanding with the state. He would teach at the reformatory and make few demands, in return for a better shop that he could never have had as a private blacksmith, and with a large number of apprentices.

Much of the work produced at the reformatory is in private hands, according to Miller, because when it was being produced it was a "currency of political patronage." In return for votes or other political favors, Miller said, objects both functional and decorative that technically belonged to the state ended up as privately owned pieces, including decorative grills and door knockers.

While Googerty lived and worked in Pontiac, he was known nationally during his lifetime According to the brochure describing the museum exhibit, "Googerty's mature aesthetic was a creative fusion of late Medieval German wrought iron traditions and contemporary Arts and Crafts, with overtones of Art Nouveau."

Googerty won a gold medal for ironwork at the 1915 San Francisco world's fair For more than a decade his work appeared in annual exhibits at the Art Institute of Chicago His ironwork also was part of a 1920-21 craft exhibit which traveled to half a dozen major cities, and Googerty was a craftsman member of the Boston Society of Arts and Crafts, promoted in 1915 to the grade of master craftsman.

But except for a period between the early 1880s and mid-1890s, when his whereabouts are uncertain, Googerty was a Pontiac resident, working with youth at the Illinois State Reformatory here, at that time a model institution promoting moral reform through manual training, a job Googerty took seriously. "The aim of the reformatory," Googerty wrote in 1903, "is to provide for the thorough training of each inmate, in the common branches of English education, and such trade or handicraft as will enable him, upon release, to earn a respectable living and redeem himself."

Googerty was also a benefactor of St. Mary's Catholic Church in Pontiac. To this day the Googerty Estate benefits the church. Googerty also made items for the church, including a wrought iron and brass cathedral poor box from 1920. One may be accounted for but there's a question if two were made

Also at the church is a large crucifix that some say is Googerty work During the church's recent renovation, parishioner Mary Fasnacht, who at the request of the former pastor has corresponded with Miller about the exhibit, examined the crucifix closely, using both a flashlight and her hands to try to find the three initials with which Googerty would sometimes — and sometimes not — sign his work. She did not find any, so the origin of the cross remains unclear.

One Pontiac resident also thinks he may have Googerty work: a bust of Abraham Lincoln and an iron rabbit. He said he wanted to contact the metal museum to see if curators were interested in them for the exhibit.

While a devout Catholic who had high hopes for the mission of the reformatory, Googerty did have other interests. He liked to go to scenic Brown County, Indiana, to paint, and, impressed with the active artists' group there, co-founded the Amityown Society of Painters in 1940, whose members liked to paint on the riverbank in Amity Township near Cornell.

The painter's group was co-founded by dentist Thomas Lockie, and, according to historian Miller, other Pontiac artists who were superb craftsman, entertained each other and "turned out all manor of work" during that era included decorator Moore Foster and jeweler H. H. Smith. Miller's maternal grandfather. Miller's mother, Virginia, was also a charter member of the painters' group.

Googerty lived at 701 N. Division St and died at St James Hospital. He is buried in St Mary's Cemetery, where the gates are one of his designs. Inmates under his direction also made the traffic and pedestrian gates at the city's South Side Cemetery that will be loaned to the Memphis Museum as a centerpiece of the Googerty exhibit.

That exhibit will show visitors proof of Googerty's 1923 assertion that "there is no reason why a blacksmith should not be termed an artist if he can produce noble and beautiful work "

The museum's director, James A. Wallace, agrees with that In the brochure for the upcoming exhibition, Wallace wrote: "Decorative metalwork so surrounds us that we often fail to recognize it. Metal has practical uses in everything from eyeglasses and automobiles to belt buckles and guard rails. True ornamental ironwork, however, is difficult to ignore . If one considers that art, and in particular, the decorative arts, are created with the goal of enhancing our living environment, then the contributions and accomplishments of Thomas F Googerty should be recognized The National Ornamental Metal Museum welcomes this opportunity to display his ironwork in a centerpiece exhibit celebrating our 20th anniversary year."

Police fire on unarmed man, killing him

NEW YORK (AP) — An unarmed immigrant street peddler with no criminal record was shot and killed by four officers who were searching for a serial rapist, police said

Amadou "Ahmed" Diallo, a 22-year-old immigrant from West Africa, was killed early Thursday in the vestibule of the building where he shared a small apartment with two roommates The four officers fired a total of 41 shots and an autopsy found Diallo was wounded 19 times in the legs, torso, back, arm and chest

Diallo, who had no criminal record, was unarmed, said a police source, speaking on condition of anonymity His wallet and a beeper were found nearby

There were no civilian witnesses and the officers involved have yet to be interviewed by investigators as requested by the Bronx district attorney's office The office would not comment on the case

Diallo's uncle, Mamadou Diallo, described the Guinea native as "a very honest guy, a religious guy" who sold hats, clothing and other items on the street

"They shoot somebody 30, 40 times," said the uncle, who talked to police after the shooting. "They tell me this is probably (a) police mistake."

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani asked residents to be patient "We all have to wait and react to facts. ... We've had terrible mistakes in this city when people have reacted to rumors and intuition and feelings."

Diallo died of multiple gunshot wounds to the torso, said Ellen Borakove, spokeswoman for the medical examiner's office The medical examiner was still determining how many bullets hit Diallo and the direction they were fired from

The four plainclothes officers — assigned to a street crime patrol — were investigating a serial rapist in the area, but it was not known if they thought Diallo was a suspect

The police source said a roommate told investigators Diallo had come home at about 11 30 p.m. Wednesday, then left again

Shortly after 12:30 a.m., the source said, the police officers had contact with a man on Diallo's street, but it wasn't clear if it was Diallo Diallo was shot in his vestibule about 10 minutes later
